I. Conference Summary

The 26th Annual MSEPS was given a theme of "Same Game, New Rules" to highlight the ever changing nature of sport and exercise psychology and our effort to stay relevant in addressing societal needs and trends while also paying to homage to the foundational thinkers that laid the groundwork for this field. Over the course of the two days, we prepared a program for students, professionals, and faculty to share knowledge designed to challenge, inspire, and motivate. Our intention was to provide students with opportunities to share their research initiatives, network with faculty, and participate in applied workshops to enhance their knowledge of the field.

We featured three keynotes speakers throughout the conference with a common thread of sharing reflective components on their academic development and successes. We were especially proud to welcome three women keynotes speakers to highlight the growing diversity of the field, particularly with Dr. Leeja Carter, AASP Diversity chair, as one of our keynotes. Dr. Carter's speech focused on the growing role of diversity in the field, and how practitioners and researchers can stay relevant and culturally component in their practices. We also welcomed Dr. Monna Arvinen-Barrow from University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee who focused her talk around the psychology of injury, with the content itself being lesser focus, but more in line with how she, as an academic grew and developed from an early PhD student to her current role. In her presentation she shared key moments and pitfalls that happened along her academic journey and offered key points for academic success now and in the future. Finally, Dr. Amber Shipherd, a first year assistant professor from Eastern Illinois University shared the ins and outs of being a new professor. Her talk highlighted important lessons such as managing work-life balance, how to keep research momentum at a teaching college, and the importance of fostering collaborations and partnerships. In general our written evaluation/feedback indicated these keynote speakers were very well received and offered tangible advice for undergraduate and graduate students.

Our conference also included several other components supporting student development such as applied workshops from professionals, roundtable sessions to discuss early stage research projects, student poster presentations, and student podium presentations. Our applied workshop showcased impressive practitioners in the field doing sport and exercise psych related work. Overall there were 10 applied workshop. A few select topics included: Building personal and social responsibility through PARKOUR, Tools for Teaching Self Awareness in Athletes as they Exercise, "Starting a plan for your professional development" (led by a career development professional in the graduate college at UIC), and Using Mindfulness-Based Biofeedback to Address Performance Anxiety and Parent-Child Communication. A new feature to MSEPS this year was the inclusion of roundtable sessions to discuss early-stage student research projects and get feedback from a group of students and professions. We felt this would be beneficial both to the students who submitted their work, and the audience members because they could participate in identifying strengths and weaknesses associated with carrying out full-fledged studies. We had 8 students lead roundtable discussions on their projects. Student poster presentations another trademark of MSEPS, attracted 15 student presentations this year and featured a mix of undergraduate and graduate student projects. Finally, there were three submissions for empirical research study podium presentations and featured impressive work. Overall, these and other conference offerings were intentionally designed to foster student growth in the SEP field.
